Find out if your Joburg home is a heritage site with new online register

4 October 2017 1:42 PM

A new heritage register has been launched, allowing residents to find out if their homes without a permit are heritage sites.

Ray White spoke to the chair of the Heritage Register, Flo Bird, about the legalities surrounding the new register.

"The point of the register is to identify and protect the valuable heritage of Joburg."

The heritage Portal

FOR MANY years, the heritage community in Joburg has been looking for a way to find out if their homes are heritage sites.

vides users with various options to find the property they are looking for.

They can use the map search on the home page or the simple and advanced options on the search page. Users must, however, be aware that only a few suburbs have been covered thus far, so if a property doesn't appear on the system, it doesn't necessarily mean that no flags apply. Users will need to conduct their own attachments and browse sources where available.

The Heritage Register has been designed specifically for property owners, developers and estate agents so that they are aware of any flags at the beginning of the planning process.

However, the system will also be useful to heritage professionals, officials, researchers, tour guides, general enthusiasts and others.

A tour guide may want to generate a list of blue plaque sites while researching a new tour.

A researcher may want to pull up a list of structures designed by a specific architect or architectural firm.

A journalist may need to find background information on a specific building while following up a hot lead.

An official, while preparing for a committee meeting, may want to see if a local organisation has rated a specific property. As the database grows, it is hoped that uses who haven't even been thought of yet will emerge.

An additional service offered by the Heritage Register is a professionals directory.

To alert buyers on historic value and processes research or hire a professional to assist when this happens.

Once users have clicked through to a site listing, they will have access to a spectrum of information including its declaration status, blue plaque status, volunteer rating, construction date, architect or architectural firm, builder and full location details (where available).

In addition, they will be able to view photographs, download
